

Christina Debs has transformed spheres of apple-green chrysoprase into this colourful bracelet with matching ring from the best-selling Candy Pop collection (bracelet $36,500; ring $6,200).

Nature is a major driving force behind the designs of Lebanese jeweller Christina Debs, and green gems are among her favourites to work with. "Since I started creating my jewellery, I have introduced a large variety of green gemstones, from chrysoprase to green agate, amazonite, aventurine, jade, sphene, emerald and tsavorite," says Debs. "Green is my best-selling colour. This is a trend not only in jewellery but also in fashion and interior design. We are seeing a return to nature."

Two new additions to her Candy Pop collection place opaque orbs of apple-green chrysoprase in crescent moons set with diamonds. "Chrysoprase is one of my favourite gems," she continues. "It is such an incredible stone – it has the power to enhance the beauty of any woman. Its lively colour is so energetic that it arouses joy." I also spotted chrysoprase – a huge oval cabochon in an unusual mint shade – at Brazilian designer Carla Amorim, whose new Cerrado collection was inspired by the dry, desert-like region of her home country.
